Features vs. benefits

Katherine Conklin

WHAT IT IS

A copywriting exercise. For five everyday products, I wrote the feature first and then the benefit it gives the person using it.

WHAT TO LOOK FOR

How a product spec turns into a reason someone would care.

The work itself starts on the next page.

Fitness tracker

FEATURE

Real-time heart rate and sleep monitoring built right into the wristband

BENEFIT

Keeps me in check even if I've actually slept well or just think I have, and it's great motivation to hit those daily steps even when I don't feel like moving.

Electric toothbrush

FEATURE

Timed, oscillating brush head that stops moving after 2 minutes

BENEFIT

Makes me feel like I'm getting a mini dentist visit twice a day without the actual appointment! I'm left feeling clean knowing I brushed for the right amount of time.

Portable Bluetooth speaker

FEATURE

Wireless, waterproof, and lightweight with 360° sound

BENEFIT

Wherever we are, it brings the vibe. No cords, no worries, just good, high-quality sound on the go.

Air purifier

FEATURE

HEPA filtration system with built-in air quality sensors

BENEFIT

Helps me breathe easier by kicking dust, pet hair, and mystery smells out, and letting me know when the air is unsafe or unhealthy, which creates peace of mind.

Smart thermostat

FEATURE

Learns your schedule and adjusts the temperature automatically via app

BENEFIT

Keeps me from freezing in the morning or coming home to a sauna. Makes me more comfortable in my own home and saves time, which makes me more productive.
